Physical

historical significance:

The Assemblies of God Church in Dayton is a simple, wooden frame building with Romanesque styling. It was originally the worship building of the Free Methodist fellowship and was standing in 1894. In 1929 the church became the worship place of the Christian Science fellowship of Dayton. It has more recently been the meeting place of the Assemblies of God Church.

The sanctuary has three prominent semi-circular windows with hooded labels and simple moulding surrounds. The porch on the south elevation (front) appears to have been enclosed and is not harmonious with the remainder of the building. The church has also probably been extended on the north elevation. It has a gable roof, is in excellent condition, and has been recently painted brown with a dark brown trim.

SITE DESCRIPTION:

The former Free Methodist Church, located on the north corner of Fifth and Oak, faces southeast on Oak Street. The Church is situated in an older residential area near the western edge of the plat of the Original Town of Dayton. The side yard setback along Fifth Street has been graveled and is used for parking.

ARCHITECTURAL DESCRIPTION:

The former Free Methodist Church, built in 1885, is rectangular in plan, one story high, and three bays deep along its side facade. The original building has a brick foundation and is supported by cedar beams. The later additions to the building have poured concrete foundations. The church has tongue and groove, horizontal beveled siding and a gable roof with boxed eaves, originally sheathed with cedar shingles. The one over one double hung, round arched windows with pronounced cap moldings decorate the side facades of the church. The windows are similar in style to those of the Baptist Church (Resource #16) constructed in 1886, except that they are constructed of wood rather than brick.

The front facade of the church was altered in about 1940 with the addition of a new front entry way. In 1945, an addition of a parsonage was made to the rear of the church. It appears that enough evidence of the original appearance of the front facade remains, including the double door entry way and hinges to the original doors, that it could be restored to its 1885 appearance.

HISTORICAL DESCRIPTION:

Known locally as Dayton's third church, this building was constructed in 1885 for the Free Methodist congregation. The property which was originally part of the Andrew Smith Donation Land Claim, passed through several owners before Lee F. Morse sold it to the Free Methodists in 1866 for the sum of $150. The church was built by John Watson who built other structures in the Dayton area, including the 1895 Dayton School. Recognized as one of Dayton's ablest carpenters, Watson was better known to the Free Methodists as their first pastor. The Free Methodist archives show in 1885 that Pastor J. Watson reported a congregation of eight members with a yearly salary of $30.40 and that the building was valued at $900. The church became the regional headquarters for Oregon and Washington, and from 1885 to 1912, the home base of the circuit riding preachers. The pastors from Dayton would travel and minister to other cities in the circuit, including Newberg, Bethany, Forest Grove, Beaverton, White Station, Sherwood, Harmony, Amity and Mission Landing. In 1890, the circuit had two points and in 1893 as many as five points.

The church property was sold to the Christian Science Society in 1912. They met there until 1929 when they disbanded to join their neighbor church in McMinnville. The correct name of the church at this time was "The First Church of Christ, Scientist." In 1929, the church property was sold for $500 to the Full Gospel Assembly who were affiliated with the fellowship of the Assemblies of God. In 1947, the congregation changed the name to Dayton Assembly of God, as it is known today. The archives of the Assemblies of God in Brooks, Oregon, confirm that the Dayton Assembly of God is one of the oldest Assembly congregations in Oregon, and may well be the first one established in Oregon.
