HISTORY
(Chronological, descriptive history of the property from its construction through at least the historic period - preferably to the present)
A. Summary statement of significance At the end of the nineteenth century, Portland had less than 200 acres of park land, much less than rival west coast cities. Most of the city's park land still lay undeveloped. The city achieved the means to build a parks system in 1900 when the voters approved creation of an independent city parks commission that could levy an annual half mill property tax for purchasing and improving parks property. The creation of the potential for urban parks development occurred at the same time that the nationwide City Beautiful movement provided a rationale for parks improvements. The City Beautiful proponents argued that progressive, up-to-date cities needed a planned public park system to provide a natural respite for its citizens from the congestion, noise, and unhealthy living and working conditions present in the commercial and industrial setting of the modern city. Land for George Himes Park, originally known as Fulton Park, was donated in 1903 by prominent Portland citizens Charles E. Ladd, H.L. Pittock, and S.B. Lombard. The park is an obscure but important link in the current 40-Mile Loop trail system. It has value to the neighborhoods as scenic green relief from surrounding development and as wildlife habitat. It offers views of Ross Island Lagoon and Oaks Bottom Wildlife Refuge, downhill from the park. In 1935 this 35-acre natural park was dedicated to George H. Himes, curator of the Oregon Historical Society, on his 91st birthday. Himes and his parents emigrated from Pennsylvania to the West Coast in the mid-19th century. His career was in commercial printing and historical research and he was instrumental in forming the Oregon Historical Society. Speakers at the ceremony declared that Himes had done more than any other person to collect and preserve Oregon pioneer relics. A bronze plaque on the face of a large boulder was unveiled at the ceremony, dedicated by the Oregon chapter of Daughters of Founders and Patriots of America. George Himes Park is significant as an early Portland park and for its association with George Himes and his role in recording and preserving information about the development of the Pacific Northwest. The park appears to qualify for listing in the National Register under the City Beautiful Movement MPS, specifically under the Associated Property Type "Urban or Neighborhood Parks." Under that category, eligible resources exhibit Olmstedian design characteristics. Natural landscape forms, scenic views and conservation of pockets of the city's forested areas were important principles, along with inclusion of native plant material and indigenous trees. This property appears to meet the latter criteria. B. Chronological history 1903 The property represented a gift worth $17,500 from Chas. E. Ladd, H.L. Pittock, and S.B. Lombard. 1912 The park was known as Fulton Park at this time. Report of the Park Board laments that adjacent acreage could not be purchased (for lack of funds) to add to the park. 1927-1928 Trails were created and fountains installed. 1940 Resolution No. 21689 expressed the gratitude of the City of Portland for Himes lifetime achievements. Mid-1930s Mention in a letter by Superintendent Keyser of a plan to replant the park on one side (i.e., of the "saddlebag" layout) with rhododendrons and on the other side with native shrubs. By 1946 this plan was estimated to cost approximately $20,000 for clearing and replanting plus some walks and a modest shelter building. This idea was not realized. 1946 Proposal to the City by a citizen (Albert Grutze) to develop George Himes Park as a Camelia and Azalea Park as a commercial attraction. The City did not act on the proposal and the park remained in a natural state. C.
